Faculty & Staff

TLC's Seven Guiding Principles

1. The “healer” in the practitioner/client relationship is the client and their own creative body/mind/spirit wisdom.
2. The role of the practitioner is to be the creator and holder of safe space, a facilitator, and a guide who provides a positive, powerful wellness orientation to the process of personal healing and growth.
3. The practitioner is trained to establish and maintain rapport. The practitioner does not impose their own beliefs, needs or agenda on the client or the unfolding work.
4. The practitioner/client relationship is based on mutual trust & client-empowerment. The client is empowered by defining their primary issues, developing goals, and discussing and negotiating their own session with guidance from the practitioner.
5. The practitioner respects and follows the scope of practice of their training including ethics, professional and sexual boundaries, and maintains and utilizes appropriate re-referral networks with other health professionals.
6. The practitioner is trained to be aware of relevant physical and mental health issues toward making skillful referrals.
7. The practitioner neither diagnoses or treats illness, medical conditions or disease nor prescribes medicines or medical advice. They agree to refrain from using terms such as curing, fixing, repairing and correcting.
